1 Component links

Component	Useful body function	Example sources
Carbohydrate	Energy for respiration	Rice, bread, potatoes
Protein	Materials for growth and repair	Beans, lentils, eggs, fish
Fat / lipid	Energy storage, insulation and absorption of fat-soluble vitamins	Oil, nuts, seeds
Vitamins	Support specific body processes in small amounts	Vitamin C: peppers; vitamin A precursor: carrots
Minerals	Support specific processes, e.g. iron for oxygen transport	Iron: lentils; calcium: dairy or fortified alternatives
Fibre	Helps food move through the gut	Wholegrains, fruit, vegetables
Water	Transport, cooling and a medium for many cell reactions	Drinking water; water in foods

2 Possible deficiency effects

Iron: iron-deficiency anaemia. Vitamin A: impaired night vision; severe prolonged deficiency can cause blindness. Vitamin C: scurvy. Vitamin D: rickets in children.

3 Guided cases

Harbour: iron below needs → possible iron-deficiency anaemia → lentils because they supply iron.

Garden: vitamin C below needs → possible scurvy → peppers because they supply C. Both records meet energy needs but have a nutrient gap.

4 Four-mark explanation

Energy needs are met, so the record does not show starvation. Vitamin A is below needs, so it shows malnutrition. Severe prolonged vitamin A deficiency can impair vision or cause blindness. Carrots provide beta-carotene, which the body converts to vitamin A, so they can help address the stated gap.

1. Energy adequate, therefore not starvation. [1]
2. Vitamin A deficiency/imbalance, therefore malnutrition. [1]
3. Accurate possible effect of vitamin A deficiency. [1]
4. Change justified by supplying beta-carotene/vitamin A. [1]

A bare “eat more” earns no change mark. Do not infer a diagnosis or that the whole diet becomes adequate. Accept other scientifically correct sources if justified.
